But to do good, and to communicate, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased. This inspired precept exhibits a prominent characteristic of our religion. It is a system that manifestly seeks both the present and future welfare of man. Embraced in faith and love, it can hardly fail to exert a purifying influence upon the heart and life. Not only has Christianity this direct tendency to reclaim from the love and practice of evil, and thus procure a permanent peace and glory for man; by infusing its heavenly spirit into a given individual, it renders him a benefactor to others. In fulfilment of its claims, he cheerfully consecrates his powers in steady and vigorous action, to the service of God and his fellow-men. He yields habitually to the authority of that numerous class of divine precepts of which our text is a fair specimen. In our world, full of ignorance, crime, and suffering,...
